6 minutes of things you all knew, but he says them out loud.

Another

> It was as if the Playboy Mansion met the East End at a wild party at private-equity titan Marc Leder's Bridgehampton estate, [where guests cavorted nude in the pool and performed sex acts, scantily dressed Russians danced on platforms and men twirled lit torches to a booming techno beat.](http://www.nypost.com/p/pagesix/nude_frolic_in_tycoon_pool_S8t8KXKG1leGFSDtN6Xm9M#ixzz1aZh6pzTI https://web.archive.org/web/20111012133949/http://www.nypost.com/p/pagesix/nude_frolic_in_tycoon_pool_S8t8KXKG1leGFSDtN6Xm9M)

> The divorced Sun Capital Partners honcho rented a sprawling beachfront mansion on Surf Side Road for $500,000 for the month of July. Leder's weekly Friday and Saturday night parties have become the talk of the Hamptons -- and he ended them in style last weekend with his wildest bash yet.

Then there's this

> At least once a week, co-workers would be discovered mid-coitus in offices, on-site showers, and even janitorial closets. It became so common that it hardly raised an eyebrow after a certain point. I suppose if you're stuck in the office 24/7, you've gotta improvise.

> As for drugs, cocaine was typically the drug of choice and made its way not only into banker nightlife, but the offices as well. While the use of cocaine may not seem SO crazy or unique in itself, keep in mind that the vast majority of these young bankers came from pretty straight-laced backgrounds and top schools, and it's a pretty abrupt change to go from keggers as a college senior to regular coke binges shortly after graduation. Talk about getting thrown into the deep end ...

> But if I had to choose one specific crazy story to rule them all, it had to be the time where an extremely high-ranking department head – as conservative as they come – threw a $200K S&M; party, “just because.” Somehow a handful of pictures emerged afterwards, showing quite a few very well-respected managing directors dressed like The Gimp and in all kinds of compromising positions. I didn't attend so I can't say just how far things went that night, but it was pretty funny to see them all back to business as usual the following Monday morning.

And this

> The New York Post said the owner of the house, who remains unnamed, is threatening a $1 million lawsuit against Barna for trashing the house, which he rented on Airbnb for $27,000.

> [The owner claims Barna "came to me dropping [Moore founder] Louis Bacon's name and saying he was a big deal with the Robin Hood Foundation. He said there would be 50 people at the event and it was for animal rescue. But the only animals there were the people," the Post reported.](<https://www.cnbc.com/2016/07/07/hedge-funder-fired-over-wild-hamptons-party.html>)

It's picking back up since covid.

> For some two years, due to pandemic fears, Wall Streeters were not allowed to entertain, and that put a crimp in the lifestyle. "When bankers took me out, I had to pick up tabs," said a client. "Now the entertainment budgets are back and they are making up for lost time. It's $12,000 dinners at Hawksmoor with $2,500 bottles of Chateau Margaux."

> [Those very same high-rollers are also being courted by the clubs where they blow thousands on a single night. "We brought in our big Wall Street clients who spend a lot of money and gifted them a bottle of Louis XIII cognac," Sameer Qureshi, co-owner of Somewhere Nowhere told The Post. "It had been aged for 100 years, went for $45,000 and is extremely rare. We paired it with caviar and served it. Representatives from the [liquor] company hand delivered the bottle and it had to be consumed while they were there – but that was not a problem."](<https://nypost.com/2022/04/09/wall-street-bros-wild-nights-of-sex-debauchery-on-the-rise/>)
