I'm sure I'll be ridiculed to hell and back. No worries, kids.

The markets are corrupt and nothing is real. EVERYTHING is made up fucking numbers and it's all bullshit built on a house of cards.

There is only about $40Trillion USD in existence worldwide, but there is over $880Trillion in derivatives? That would scare the fuck out of even The Who's "Tommy", you know, that "deaf, dumb and blind kid"?

Ryan Cohen and Matt Furlong are in on it and apparently don't give a single fuck about their investors. That's what it's starting to look like to many people.

They have provided no substantive communications, no defense of the clearly manipulated stock, and remain on radio silence. They apparently don't feel they have a fiduciary responsibility to their investors. They may have been bought off and will do nothing while Gamestop is driven into oblivion. They will have their billions and save the corrupt system from collapse, thus preserving it for all time. Think that's absurd?

Even billionaires can be bought. It seems that way to me. How else do you explain away the complete and utter lack of progress, announcements, fuck, anything? They struck a deal. They'll collect billions in exchange for not exposing the bull shit. They are part of the system, and thus, the problem.

Call me a shill or what ever you like. Not a problem. I'm just laying out a plausible theory. That's no different than the many, many opinions written on why we'll moon soon.... mine seems to have some validity to it. Anyone who sits by idly and watches their company be destroyed, watching their market cap drop by over 50%, doesn't seem to be intent on making their company a success. They are in fact, making it clear they have no intent on doing anything but walking away with their billions.

We are all bag holders now.
