

Title: Oh boy! Here it comes! Reddit is going to begin censoring anything they don't like. I'm sure the puddle deep excuse is to combat posts that don't suit the Reddit hivemind, but rest assured Reddit's owners will come for GME investors, too, considering the risk we pose to them.

How does disruptive comment collapsing work?

9 hours ago · Updated

The disruptive comment collapsing feature is an experiment that gives redditors more control over their Reddit experience by giving them the option to limit content that's potentially disruptive. Currently, this is just an experiment and isn't a permanent feature, so you may not have access to this feature.

The setting provides three options to limit potentially disruptive comments:

- High: Collapses the most comments and is mostly likely to collapse things that may not necessarily be disruptive.
- Medium: Collapses some comments and is somewhat likely to collapse things that may not necessarily be disruptive.
- Low: Collapses the least content and is least likely to collapse things that may not necessarily be disruptive.

For now, the setting is only available in English.

What's considered to be potentially disruptive?

Comments are identified as "potentially disruptive" by a mix of signals, including sentiment analysis, and could include abusive or hateful language, insults, and threats. There's subjectivity when it comes to sentiment analysis, which is why we're giving redditors control over what suits them best. Redditors can also choose to not turn the setting on at all and keep their experience as it is today.

Where can I find this setting?

This setting is currently available on desktop and not yet available on Reddit's mobile apps or the mobile web.

On reddit.com

1. Visit your User Settings and click on the Safety & Privacy tab.
2. From there you'll see Collapse potentially disruptive comments section where you can choose which option feels the most comfortable for you.
