I think too many people are focused on the very narrow view of just GameStop. Allow me to expand the universe of thinking.

This is so much bigger than just one stock. Losing was never an option. You don't hear anyone talking about a bailout for very specific reasons... the people behind this want that system to disappear. I don't care where you are politically, but in general, you either understand this or you don't. If you understand it, you should want it to happen.

How do you insure that this happens when politics have protected them for so long? You make the problem ... everyone's problem. There's a reason Chinese Real Estate companies are crashing out of nowhere... it forces people that hold bad debt to hold things like GameStop as a hedge against that debt. The shit show in Kazakhstan just so happens to trade 1/5 of the worlds BTC. I haven't figured out why Turkey is on fire (yet), but I know it's likely relate to money in the Middle East.

Very soon, companies like BlackRock (rumored to have a lot of Evergrande exposure) that also hold a lot of GME shares will have to make decisions about survival. When the bad Chinese debt becomes official, they will likely not be able to meet a margin call unless GameStop MOASS happens. The money they take in will allow them to survive. Others that are short GME will not survive.

As for us, sitting back and watching it all burn is our only remaining to-do...
