Disclaimer: I am smoother than skippy, this is just a high thought i had that i wanted to share in my echo chamber. Dont take it too seriously.

I've seen a lot of focus on Twitter and in other subreddits in the last 24 hours on a specific member of congress and alleged inside trader. Pretty much every post I've seen says that next year's strategy should be to follow what Nancy Pelosi does. Fundamentally, I don't think this is a bad idea because obviously she gets pretty good returns. The problem in my mind is that insider trading is not a problem isolated to just Pelosi, so shouldn't we be forming a portfolio based on all members of congress if following inside traders was the strategy? Diversification and all that.

I thought it was weird that every Pelosi post has a common reminder within it: PeLoSee HaS pOpCoRn!!

Is this another attempt to try to get the masses to fomo into popcorn and keep the heat off GME?

I'm not here to debate politics or morality of politician's access to the stock market because that will only divide us. Poke some holes in my theory though. Let me know if you've noticed something similar or if you think I need to start school back over and take the short bus everyday. Is Pelosi just the lightning rod for the rest of the congressional inside traders? Is there something more sinister going on?
