Some users were asking for regular updates, so here we go. Bonus: moving averages.

And the events (probably) explaining the NYSE spikes (this image is missing the last few days):

My thoughts:

- * The NYSE spike on the most recent quad witching day (last Friday) was much higher than the other QWDs. I have honestly no idea why, but I'm wondering if it has something to do with the fact that we didn't see a share price run up for this swaps cycle.

- * Notice the increase in IEX around late April - I believe this is around when apes became aware of the benefits of that exchange. It went from around 1% of daily volume to around 3%. Assuming this increase was caused by apes, can we use that info to calculate daily diamond hand buying power? (Remember, only a fraction of apes can/do use IEX)

- * IMO it's too early to determine the effect of computershare on NYSE. The giant spike on Friday is skewing the moving average. But if you squint your eyes hard enough while looking at the NYSE moving average chart, you can just barely make out the MOASS. You have to squint really hard though.
