After the last year and a half we've witnessed a slew of attempts to make shareholders dump their GME investments. Since most of the methods used have been outright failures, don't be surprised when the stock is allowed to run a bit, then suppressed right back down to recent lows (late March for example). Personally, I set my expectations for the stock to be pushed back down below $70 again. Now, I don't necessarily believe it will happen, but I keep my mind set on this instead of expecting it to break 4 digits any time soon. This way if anything else happens it's almost a guarantee to be a favorable outcome.

I set me expectations low, not my sale price. Yes, you can dwell on low expectations yet keep that sale price looking like your phone number. Not only does it help get my mind off the boatload of money I've placed into Gamestop, it's also the best way to experience when the stock takes off.
