So here goes my little night cap thought. If you are not familiar with the Baader-Meinhof phenomenon it's a theory of frequency. Once you are exposed to something new you will start to see it around you like it popped out of the blue. Like cars in GTA. Once you get the cool one you're looking for it's freaking everywhere lmao.

Well I think we're all experiencing just that. We've grown to learn the dark side of the market and it's become normal to us. What we see is what others haven't looked into yet. Every single one I've introduced to this cesspool of what Americans call "The free market" they've gone from sceptics to anywhere between believers and fanatics. One of them has traded stocks for most of his adult life and always believed some were up to nefarious activities but never looked. Once exposed, to the brilliant DD written amongst our forums, he would start to see it everywhere and the distrust followed.

Now there is another theory that's been brought up earlier, regarding DRS, called diffusion of innovation. We are the early adopters of DRS, sure, but we are also the innovators of the movement against Wall Street and corrupted markets. Once we tilt the view this way it is easy to see how we are not reaching millions upon millions of DRS account holders within three quarters. Exposure is needed and for some it might help to exclude GME from the conversation. Just the fact that more people open their eyes to the crooked things going on in today's market would cause a massive shift in where money is held.

Just think of us pushing GME on someone oblivious like explaining The Kardashians to.. well.. anyone. It probably won't make sense but if you get them to listen suddenly things will pop up. They will call you saying SPY is down because of BETACAROTEN Covid and call it bullshit. They will call you saying GME just ran to 200, why? They will know because they chose the red pill and listened to you instead of remaining uneducated. Sure, some will never listen but those who do, you will reach exponentially more people with just that one individual.

So I guess what I'm trying to say is that we might need some time for the general public to lean our way. Let's hope that happens before the wolfs of wall street leans on them in order to pay us.
