The screenshot shows the mobile app interface for The Motley Fool. At the top, the status bar displays the time 3:29, the date Mon 25, and a battery level of 94%. The app's header is dark blue with the 'The Motley Fool' logo and a hamburger menu icon. Below the header is a white section for the author's profile. It features a circular profile picture of David Jagielski, his name 'David Jagielski', and his handle 'TMFdjagielski'. A text box below the profile picture contains a bio: 'David Jagielski is a designated accountant and has spent 10+ years working in finance for small and large businesses in many different sectors. He has been writing for The Fool since 2017. When he's not out hunting for cheap stocks or writing articles, odds are he's writing macros in Excel or reading history books.' Below the bio is a section titled 'RECENT ARTICLES' with an orange square icon. Two articles are listed: 'Could AbbVie Stock Help You Retire a Millionaire?' by David Jagielski, dated Jul 22, 2022, and '2 Beaten Down Stocks That Could Rally in the Second Half of...'. The bottom of the screen shows a dark navigation bar with a home icon, a lock icon, the URL 'fool.com/author/20105', a tab count of 10, and a back arrow.

A Stock Split Doesn't Make GameStop a Buy

GameStop (NYSE:GME) officially split its shares last week. However, that didn't help provide any boost to the stock as it finished in the red on the day. While news of stock splits can sometimes generate excitement around a stock and help it rally, the changes are purely aesthetic.

A company's financials don't improve due to a stock split, it simply means investors now own more shares at a different price. If you had a $1,000 investment in the stock, it's still a $1,000 investment after the split. The only change is the number of shares and the stock price. Companies may deploy the move to drum up some excitement.

It may be that for a high-priced stock like Amazon (NASDAQ:AMZN), a split makes its shares more accessible to investors – particularly ones who can't
