So, a good year back, I stumbled across WSB before it was full of shills pumping trash stocks, and read a bit about GameStop. As a goof, I threw $3K at my first 40 shares $75 and watched it fall to $40, but I kept reading.

I found that there were enough people making sense with SOLID due diligence and research to substantiate what they were saying, and when the price started climbing, I finally had enough confidence to make a far larger investment (fuck me for not being smart enough at 40...but I digress).

I recruited my first friend in at the same time, and then another, and then a few more. With the current run up, I've trained them through the fuckery and bullshit that is the US stock market. They see it now, and will never be fooled again. We have new people asking when do we sell...

Our answer is "Do you see commas? We're not selling until there's comma's in the price and our accounts. If you can look at the number and immediately figure out what it is, it's still too early..."

Be ready to be tested. $1,000/share has only one comma, but you know something? So does $10,000 or $999,999...
