A word to all apes,

This will happen again. And then again, and again. This is the same chain of events as last time they stopped GME.

1. GME go brrrrrr
2. DTCC raises capital requirements from 10-15% to a 250% increase. 250%*15%=37.5% that means the broker who is clearing through the DTCC needs to pony up 37.5% of the cost of the trade instead of 15%. That's a lot more. 250% more. They did the same thing during the sneeze.
3. No one clears through the dtcc while the trade is halted and the NYSE has to say the trade is good or the trade is not good based on what the parameters of the trade are. This time the NYSE rejected the trade because the price was too high above the previous price.
4. As soon as the order books have cleared off the rejected trade GME is no longer volatile and the capital requirements go back to 15% and they can process selling orders that were lined up during the halt.
5. This is 100% legal and required by the market if you listen to the DTCC.
