Yes, ComputerShare has raised the per order limit specifically for GameStop, and yes, only by DRS-ing shares you're guaranteed to own actual shares (and help lock the float at the same time).

Also, there's plenty of talk about DRS-ing in the various subs. Purple circles everywhere. Great.

But, isn't it strange that there's nearly no talk about the ComputerShare per share limit price of $214k? It's almost like this subject is getting suppressed...

Still, people do talk about the GME floor (nearly $100 million by now), not paper handing until a single share pays life changing money, etc,

...but how are you going to get such sums if your entire GME holding is 100% at ComputerShare, and when prices finally start to rise, but they haven't lifted their limit?!?

Yeah, there's this NBBO rule that could give you more than your asking price - but for that, there needs to be offers above your asking price ... and if you're selling from ComputerShare, that asking price can't be more than $214k per share! (Plus, parties closing shorts will know about this limit and simply not buy for more.)

When people do talk about this, it's words like:

"I'm convinced ComputerShare will remove the limit" (but without anything to back that up), or

"I'd be happy with $214k per share" (seriously?! what happened to life changing money?), or

Suggesting to keep some shares behind in various reliable broker accounts is frowned upon by the "100% DRS" advocates, but other than that there's not many solutions to this problem (other than keep asking ComputerShare to raise their limit).

So, let's discuss solutions, make some noise, and solve this issue, as otherwise this is going to be the coldest shower of your life when this isn't fixed before shorts start closing!!!

&quot;Just transfer some shares back to your broker to sell there" (no guarantees that will happen in time and even be possible), or
