Hi everyone. Not sure if this is the right place to post this but figured I'd give it a shot. I was thinking about how expensive it is for hedgies to keep shorting GME (and other tickers). With insane interest rates each day it would be virtually impossible to keep throwing that amount of money at keeping the price suppressed — even if the hedge funds have billions. Which got me thinking of the recent 149,900% gain this month from Vulcan international VULC.

Granted it's an OTC stock so maybe everyone knows there's crime happening but that doesn't make it any less illegal. Ive been here since last December but have only recently been more interested in the mechanics of the stock market (very few wrinkles) so was hoping someone else could shed some light on this for me...

Specifically, is this an example of just how easy it is for hedgies to turn a massive profit through OTC stocks without anyone even noticing (they meaning the government, authority, regulators, fbi?)

It used to just be zombie stocks like blockbuster and sears which doesn't make it any less shady, but where does Vulcan international doesn't fit— can someone help me understand?

I've been checking this stock over the past week or so and it appears that they stopped updating the prices on the 14th. In December they announced a dividend and then boom the stock flies in the next week or so.

I can't help but think this is an example of how they continue to get away with fuckery and there's nothing we can ever do about it.

You want to buy this stock? You can't, sorry. Why is that?

If anyone can shed some light here it would be very helpful. Thank you
