GME stock fell 10.3% the day after it reported earnings in December, with the company reporting a third-quarter loss that was wider than the year prior. Another negative earnings reaction will only exacerbate its long-term downtrend, with shares off more than 62% in the last 12 months.

Even with this significant decline in GME's share price, it "remains a dangerous stock," says David Trainer, CEO of investment research firm New Constructs. This is because GameStop, like many of its fellow meme stocks, "remain dangerously overvalued and don't generate anywhere near the profits necessary to justify their current valuations."

This opinion seems to be shared by Wall Street analysts, who carry a consensus Sell
