This isn't about retail investors or even Robinhood. It's about Griffin's real rival: Goldman Sachs.

When you add more than a billion dollars' worth of liquidity to a market maker that already executed more than one of every four trades in the U.S. markets on a daily basis, while simultaneously giving it bleeding-edge access to the fastest-growing asset class in modern financial history, that's not a bailout. It's a warning.

Citadel Securities announced a $1.15 billion investment from venture-capital giant Sequoia and cryptocurrency investment outfit Paradigm early Tuesday, and it blew a lot of minds, even if some were clearly blown in the wrong direction.

Social media immediately lit up in response to the announcement with speculation among retail investing "Apes" that the funding is an emergency measure taken by the Citadel Securities founder – and meme-stock archvillain – Ken Griffin, who, in their minds, is in need of huge amounts of cash to stave off the MoASS or "mother of all short squeezes."
