Good Morning fellow Apes and Apettes!

Austrian Ape here coming with some news, as well as some questions.

My Broker Sparkasse (specifically Kärntner Sparkasse, the southern branch) just confirmed to me that they "handled it like a normal split" and they "didn't receive any data regarding a dividend".

Now, I will add some additional infos at the bottom for everyone who is interested in how exactly they handled it, but for now the most important question for me personally is:

WHAT NOW?

Yes of course I want to show them that what they did was not intended from GameStop, but what exactly can I show them that has any official meaning to a bank. I am sure a screenshot of the ComputerShare-Tweet wouldn't get me very far. I am grateful for anything you can provide me with. I will of course keep you updated whenever I receive new information from my broker.

Additional Info:

Sparkasse Kärnten handled the split especially weird. It wouldn't even have crossed my mind to ask if they handled the split correctly if not for how extraordinarily weird they handled it. So for my NYSE stocks they first took away (the german word they used was "ausgebucht/ausbuchen") all the shares that I had and then gave me ("angereiht/anreihen") the share amount*4. Which I thought was very weird because why would they need to take away my shares if in actuality they were supposed to provide me with 3* my share amount without any of those shenanigans.

Also I spoke to them if this "taking away" my stocks would be a taxable event similar to selling my shares and they confirmed that it is indeed NOT a taxable event.

You can gladly share this to Superstonk. My poor K*rma-Management prevents me in participating in this glorious sub.
